In such devices, either the money is deposited in one compartment and coins received in the other, or the coins go into one compartment and money into the other. The coins may be introduced in bulk or sequentially. The problem which the invention seeks to solve is that of eliminating the tendency for the device to "feed" coins or bills into the wrong compartment. It will be understood that the interest in vending machines, parking meters, toll booths and the like is that such devices should dispense the desired commodity without making an excessive demand for the commodity. In the past, various means have been devised for ensuring that the proper product is dispensed. In some cases, the product is dispensed in response to pressing a particular button, or the like, or a coin deposited in the device is counted to determine when to dispense the product. In other cases, coin or paper money is deposited in the device and, after a predetermined delay, the device dispenses a product in response to the receipt of a single or series of coins. Devices for ensuring that the proper product is dispensed, or that a single or series of coins are deposited in such devices, have in the past suffered from various disadvantages. For example, the prior art devices are not responsive to the proper type of coin. In response to a number of coins, such devices may dispense too many or too few products. Further, since many devices present to the user only a single or a limited number of choices, these devices do not permit the user to custom-select a product. The only options presented are "coin" or "no coin", and "product" or "no product". we need to intervene in the name of patients' rights, to ensure that they receive the care they need. Research into the culture of medicine--and the implication that this culture must be changed--is, of course, a complex undertaking. In recent years, the Canadian Institute for Health Research
