I'd like to write a function that will add 1 to a variable and save it to a database. I can write the code, but I need to get it to work in both Python 2.7 and Python 3.x. My question is whether I can make an optional argument that would then create a default argument with 1. def add(a=1): my_var = a + 1 print(my_var) In Python 2.7: >>> add() 2 In Python 3.x: >>> add() 2 If I could make add have an argument, a=None, then I can have it work in both Python 2.7 and Python 3.x. A: This is probably what you want: def add(a=None): if a is None: a = 1 my_var = a + 1 print(my_var) What you're describing, in code, would look like this: def add(a=None): if a is None: a = 1 print(a) The problem with this, of course, is that if you want to use this function in Python 3, you'll have to explicitly say that you want to send an argument to this function. The function signature will be add(a=1), and then you can't pass an argument to it unless you send it an argument. def add(a=None): if a is None: a = 1 print(a) 4bc0debe42
