Scanning mutagenesis of conserved amino acids in the transmembrane region of the gamma-amino-n-butyric acid receptor. The ligand-gated receptor gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA) receptor provides a molecular model system for the study of transmembrane protein structure/function. Amino acids in the transmembrane domain of this receptor, in a region termed "the gating charge-cluster", are predicted to form a contiguous interaction with the ligand-binding domain. This segment of the receptor is highly conserved in all receptor subunits, yet the contribution of specific amino acids in this region to ligand-gated ion channel function has not been defined. We have mutated each of the conserved amino acids individually to determine their role in ligand-gated ion channel function. Our results show that four of the conserved amino acids within the gating charge-cluster play a role in receptor function.
